

McShull's History and His Points on Capitalism

By Ian Macentosh

I. Marx's Capitalism

Capital develops by a accumulation of capital, and develops like a history and goes from British colonialism, to American financial cycles. Just this is capitalism, and a capitalist is a rich miser who is Jewish and smart. A crisis is because of wage crises in society, and a capitalist living that crisis is following the agenda of far right politics somehow. He is also a good person though, a Jewish miser.

II. McShull and idealism in American Transitions

I mean jokes make a lot of money - think of this joke - money is small money, what is big money, how do I ace it, perhaps think of shoes, and boom it. You get this, a normal joke is about your money being lesser and me being richer, and I go richer by being smarter.

A true joke is higher than that and makes it boom.

III. A List of Such Insights from the American Transition

So lifestyles, habits of phone calling, talking on newspapers, crowds, conversations, and even ideating, and joking.

McShull means we need that connected a world.

IV. Modelling this as American Transitions

I model these developments as working class idealism in Queen's in America's New York and the black lyricism of Brooklyn nearby and all the developments of companies and department stores in American transitions and the end of slavery and Lincoln doing that and all this makes it to the capitalist and models his company as successful based on insights, perspectives and opinions and talking and creative ideas - the more intellectual side in America is then a factor in history. By that it just means connections, to people actually. Mcshull just means to be objective, my connections matter, my deals on phones begin the company.
